Program Manual Directions for Preparing a Reading List

“The comprehensives are intended to prepare the student for the dissertation, to do research and to teach in a field. Outside the structure of a course, the comprehensive provides the student with the challenge of examining and synthesizing a body of theory, and usually related empirical research. Comprehensiveness in a field combines breadth, depth and synthetic ability, without necessarily entailing exhaustive knowledge of the field. Students are expected to have a broad understanding of the major theoretical perspectives in the field and key debates. In most fields, comprehensiveness also requires good knowledge of the alternative approaches to relevant empirical research, key findings and their interpretation in relation to theoretical approaches, and gaps in current research.

It is the responsibility of the programme to provide a list of the acceptable comprehensive fields, updated annually, and the names of available faculty with expertise in each field. With the approval of the student's faculty group or Supervisory Committee and the Graduate Programme Director, comprehensives may be written in fields other than those designated. Any such additional field, however, must have the same generality as the designated fields. A more specialized area is better explored as part of the student's dissertation or other research. Students usually choose comprehensive fields in which they expect to teach, but this is not a requirement....

The student and the Comprehensive Supervisory Committee will jointly decide on a reading list for each comprehensive; for comprehensive groups this will be done collectively, but will still require student-faculty agreement. The list will be equivalent to about 25 medium-sized books, with articles counting for about one-fifth of a book. Students are encouraged to make use of reading lists from completed comprehensives, filed in the program office. Cumulatively, lists of core readings will be developed in each field, and they will be updated regularly. Students might take 15-20 readings from the core list and add 5-10 to reflect their particular interests, or find a balance that suits them and is acceptable to the faculty group or committee supporting and assessing the comprehensive.”
(from 2005/2006 Program Manual, emphasis added)

For more information, including the programme's list of acceptable comprehensive field(s), which includes some for which sets of core readings are not provided here, and the names of available faculty with expertise in each field, please consult the Programme Office and/or the Program Manual.

² The field of critical sexualities studies has experienced enormous growth over the past two decades, and it is as broad-ranging as any field found in social theory today. Critical sexualities studies includes, but is not limited to, sociological perspectives, the science of sexuality/sexology, feminist psychoanalysis, transgender theory, feminist theory and the sex debates, Foucauldian analysis, materialist analysis, queer theory, post-colonial approaches, Black studies, and emergent work on transnationality. These are clearly intersecting areas, rather than discrete approaches. As a mere handful of faculty members, we cannot claim to hold strengths in all of these areas. However, we have attempted to compile a list of core texts, along with some additional recommended texts, that includes selections from most of these areas, with the expectation that this list will be expanded and adapted to suit the individual student's interest.

Textbooks

Bell, Michael Mayerfeld (2004). An Invitation to Environmental Sociology. (2nd ed.). Thousand Forks: Pine Forge Press.

³ The literature on the social dimension of environmental studies is immense. Sociology participates in an extensive scholarly interest in the environment. The boundaries between what sociologists are interested in and the interests of other cognate disciplines are blurred. Items listed, even in the "Core" section, cover sociology, political ecology, economics, environmental history, anthropology and geography. In the "Other Recommended Readings", we include a section of textbooks. These are useful reading for comprehensives because they organize the field in different ways. The textbooks also help in considering whether there is a distinctively sociological contribution to the field of environmental studies.

⁵ All contributors to this list would like to emphasise that it is only a starting point for students when thinking about getting their bibliographies together for a list of comprehensive readings. This list is a useful place to begin, but it does not represent a definitive vision of the field of 'Law and Justice.' Contributors to the list emphasise that the field is dynamic and changing, and that both students' and scholars' interests in it is evolving. Especially given the interdisciplinary nature of scholarship under this rubric, the contributors feel that the list should be interpreted and used somewhat flexibly.

Two books based on survey research

Possibilities include one of the books on recent Canadian national elections, such as André Blais, Anatomy of a Liberal Victory: Making Sense of the Vote in the 2000 Canadian Election (Peterborough, Ont.: Broadview Press, 2002). Books based on national election studies in Britain, the US and Australia would serve as well. Another alternative is to select books based on "quality of life" surveys; the classic is Angus Campbell, Philip Converse and Willard Rogers, The Quality of American Life (New York: Russell Sage, 1986). Also consider one of the volumes based on the world values surveys, perhaps the most recent, Ronald Inglehart and Christian Welzel's Modernization, Cultural Change and Democracy: The Human Development Sequence (New York and Cambridge: Cambridge U. Press, 2005).
